

Séamus Power is a postdoctoral fellow in the department of comparative human development at the University of Chicago. His PhD and MA are also from that department. He has an MPhil in Social & Developmental Psychology from the University of Cambridge and a BSc in Applied Psychology from University College Cork. He is a cultural psychologist who uses multiple methods to research economic inequality, cultural clashes, and social movements.

His research, titled 'How the perception of economic inequality leads to civic unrest' was featured as a lead article in Current Anthropology. Along with his collaborators, his methodological contribution titled 'The SAGE model of social psychology research' was published in Perspectives on Psychological Science. His research on social movements also appeared in a series of essays in The Guardian which he co-wrote with David Nussbaum.

All his research is available open access here. He tweets from @SeamusAPower