Bio

I am excited about being introduced to a field that I am passionate about, and that I have learned very little about during my clinical course.

I have recently graduated from the University of Oslo with a degree in clinical psychology.

Though I have learned and grown tremendously during those years, I have also reflected about the seemingly lack of focus on cultural and global perspectives of clinical psychology. With a Vietnamese background, I could not help but think that my family and relatives would have a hard time relating to the Western psychology that we are predominantly taught and will ultimately practice. As Norway is becoming increasingly diverse when it comes to culture, way of life and understanding, I believe there is a need to develop psychological perspectives and services that feels relevant for everyone. This is one of my main motivations as a psychologist, and a foundation that I strive to have in everything I do.
